patience for nearly a generation. Taxed at an equal rate with the rest of the Capital City since 1871, Georgetown has lost its corporate responsibility without gaining the greater advantages of civic development. What was once the court end of the District is now isolated by unsightly means of communication and absolutely without a park, and the women of the District, nine-tenths of them property owners, alive to the needs of the rising generation, have united to petition from Congress an iron bridge over Rock Creek connecting Q street, tastefully parked at its approaches, its banks redeemed by plantings of laurel and rhododendron, in order to secure an entrance to the residence portion of Georgetown free from the possibility of emcroaching buildings, and for a park on Georgetown Heights.

"Air, light, water, and highways are primary conditions of civilization, and next to that human life needs exercise. No child, boy or girl, should be forced to play in the gutter, no youths reduced to 100,000 inhabitants and no park, this is the condition in Georgetown, and the need for change is imperative. The purchase, as petitioned, of the "Montrose" tract of sixteen acres on Georgetown Heights would give to the entire District, as well as to Georgetown, a new pleasure ground and an ornament.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON.

"By the President:

"THOMAS JEFFERSON."

At this time, too, Thomas Twining, a noted Englishman, visited Georgetown and wrote of it.

His famous prophecy in regard to the United States has been fully realized, but takes on new interest in the present development:

"The infancy of America was full of freshness and vigor and had already discovered the gigantic proportions of her future state. The stars of her constellation had but recently appeared above the horizon, but increasing in number, elevation, and splendor, they will hereafter shine to the most distant kingdoms of the earth. It is a country abounding with genius, energy, and enterprise, whose infant years have preduced a Washington, a
